

Compliance

Whilst there are similarities between compliance and security, IT compliance drives a business to practice due diligence in the protection of its digital assets. It is more focused on the requirements of third parties such as client's contractual terms, government or security frameworks.

Security is driven by the need to guard against ongoing threats to an organization's assets, not necessarily to satisfy a third party's requirements like compliance is.

We advise you on the procedures that you need to have in place and guide you through being fully compliant without all the jargon

For most businesses, remaining compliant has always been an ongoing headache for IT.

In the past, national legislation such as HIPAA and SOX were driving security concerns around hardware and software. Nowadays, organizations must manage, secure and ensure compliance for the massive amounts of data they generate, especially when faced with global legislation like GDPR. Non-compliance can be very expensive, both financially and from a reputational viewpoint. Attaining and maintaining compliance can be a real minefield and there are several areas to consider such as BYOD, software patch management, access control and GDPR to mention just a few.
